INTO VICTORY GARDENS the family food supply, Alabamy AUBURN, Ala.—Don't let your branch bottoms grow briars and snakes this summer when they can be converted into successful "victory" gardenss. That is the advice of C. L. Isbell, horticulturist of the Alabama Experiment Station.

the family food supply, Alabama farm women can utilize many rich food products growing wild in fields and forests and on mountainsides.

In times like the present, Alabama housewives will be wise to get acquainted with these food products—native wild fruits, nuts, and herries—and use them to products.

According to Dr. Isbell, now is the time to clean up bottom land, get it ditched, apply manure, turn it under, and fallow the land in order to have an abundance of vegetables this fall.

products—native which trints, nuts, and berries—and use them to provide low-cost variety in meals and to supplement the food budget, says Mildred Simon, extension nutritionist.

When ripe, a wild persimmon

When ripe, a wild persimmon is about as soft as a baked apple or baked custard and is a delicious fruit, very high in food value, richer in calories than bananas. Scientists say that persimmons are as rich in vitamin C as oranges, grapefruit and lemons. They are excellent, when used like ripe.
